FADLLAH.

Concluded.

I leave you to work up a romance out of this narrative if you please. For my part, I shall adhere exactly to truth. The old gentleman was Count —, the head of a noble family reduced almost to poverty, and scarcely able to continue inhabiting the large mansion of his fathers. The garden was tended by his own hands, and those of his daughter Fenella; and in spite of their aristocratic origin, they were both very simple, nay, humble people, except when two hereditary prejudices were brought into play. You seem to think that such characters are necessarily unromantic; but where, in the harmonious monotony of their existence, can you find the materials of the sublime; what mighty passions can have played around their tranquil heart; what greater sorrows are likely to have occurred to them than the bursting of a bottle of the Count's good wine, stored up for special occasions; or the death of Fenella's litter; or the rebellion of the aged domestic, sent round unreasonably often to beat up credit amidst plebeian shopkeepers? You smile; but my ideas of romance include spacious halls and blemished castles, and haughty dames and gallant knights, and elegant squires and prancing horses, and hooded falcons and the glistening of warlike weapons; and quite exclude a decayed, old, shabby-gentleman, living on economical principles, with a daughter who makes her own clothes, as is often seen in her bower!

Admitting, however, that something might be made of all this, what do you think of our school-boy, Fadllah, representing himself as an Eastern prince on his travels, and suppressing altogether the fact of his Mohammedanism? What do you think of this thus acquiring the confidence of the old Count under false pretences, as well as the love of his daughter? This came not all to pass in a day, but it came to pass very shortly. Fadllah played the truant; remained a fortnight instead of a day in Pisa; spent every day in the society of the Count and his daughter; and returned only to restraint and reprimand when every farthing of money he possessed was exhausted. Of course, he contrived to construct a plausible excuse; and of course, after a brief period, he started off to Pisa again without permission. One or two escapades of this kind produced a threat from the superintendent that he should be sent back to Egypt; upon which he openly rebelled, scorned all authority, and absented himself entirely from the school. He obtained a little money by selling some jewels and weapons he possessed, and naturally repaired to Pisa, to drink in draughts of love and hope from the eyes of his fair Fenella.

Whether from a conscientious motive or from a desire to produce a decisive impression on a somewhat superstitious mind, he was led to confess to being a Moslem, and to express a desire of conversion. He solemnly and publicly abjured his religion, and adopted that of the delighted Fenella. Soon he openly declared himself her suitor, was accepted, and looked forward to being speedily united with the object of his love. His means, however, were drawing to a close, and he was ashamed to confess the falsehood he had originally uttered about his wealth. He wrote to his family in Egypt, but received no answer, all his letters being intercepted in our office; and at length in a fit of rash confidence, or under the irresistible impulse of fate, went down to Leghorn and again entered into communication with the Egyptian agents. These persons, it appears, considered it to be of paramount importance that an example should be made of him, and adopted every justifiable means; such as stating that the Pacha had expressed benevolent intentions towards him, to induce him to go on board an Egyptian frigate that happened to be in the harbor. Thus he had come to Alexandria, entertaining high hopes of forgiveness, but determining in his own mind that when he could lay hands on a certain sum of money, he would again make his escape, and return to claim the hand of Fenella. A letter to the Count had already explained that sudden business had called him back to his country; and he had prepared a very beautiful and probable story of his return — to the effect that he had been driven from his dominions by a rival prince, and had only escaped with a small sum of money.

Laying aside all prudential considerations, I repeat this story by overthrowing every hope expressed by poor Fadllah during its relation, and earnestly besought him to accompany me down to the old port, where I could easily get a boat at any time of the night, and I engaged in half an hour to put him on board the Otho. He seemed staggered by my serious tone, and asked me in a very trembling voice what the usual punishment of such disobedience as he had been guilty of might be. He did not understand that the most important charge was the change of religion; and when I mentioned the galley for life, or perhaps death, he laughed; but it was an uneasy, fearful laugh, representing the strange and terrible ideas that were arising amidst his reverie of love, like a huge, loathsome snake rearing its head above a beautiful bed of flowers. He told me then, in a few rapid, pathetic phrases, such as I have heard no other man pronounce, how his whole soul was wrapped up in Fenella, and how he feared death only because it would cause a separation between him and her.

In this kind of dialogue we lost some time; but I was again urging the absolute necessity of flight, and pleading for Fenella as if I knew and loved her, when a number of torches, rapidly advancing from the direction of palace, drew our attention.

"What are those?" inquired Fadllah, frightened at anything now.

"Nothing but the patrol," I said; "let us remain close down by the water's edge. They will pass along the high bank; and when they are out of sight we will cross the promontory to the boat, and you shall go abroad."

"Yes," he answered, half crouching; "I will do as you tell me. I will quit this place of blood—I will fly for my life—What if I be poor, will Fenella love me bottles for miles of which—100 cent. less so that we may have a saving of a large sum."
